

IN LONDON'S PORT · A CURIOUS TRAIN · LIGHTED TRAFFIC-LINES

An Old Favourite—The Punch and Judy show has a universal appeal. This picture shows that children and grown-ups in China find great amusement in the quaint little puppets.

New Haig Statue—This fine statue of Earl Haig on his charger has been made by Mr. Ward Willis to the order of Lady Haig for consideration as a national memorial.

A Sign of Winter—So far there has been less snow this winter except in the North than for a year or two past. This charming picture of a snow-covered lane was taken in Yorkshire.

The Broken Mast—Severe damage has been suffered by fishing fleets in the winter gales. One of the fishermen at Lowestoft is here seen examining the broken topmast of his boat.

Two Friends—For long the Alsatian has been the most popular dog, but there are signs that its supremacy is being challenged. These two intelligent Alsatis, however, are obviously confident of being able to hold their own.

In London's Port—There is always something of interest to be seen at the docks. Here, for instance, is a scene near London Bridge when a cargo of oranges was being unloaded.

A Curious Train—On a small railway which runs from Shrewsbury into Wales, this coach, driven by two Ford motors, carries passengers. [Here we see Mrs. Williams, who acts as the entire staff of Maesbrook Station, giving the signal for the train to leave.

New Lights of London—Here is an improvement on the white lines that are painted at many busy cross-roads and other places. These workmen are letting into the road at Marble Arch, London, a glass-covered trough which is illuminated at night.
